Twice did the Nationals and Yankees take the field yesterday afternoon, each scoring a victory.

Both games were shut-outs, cleanly played, sensational in spots, the first going the way of the visitors with a lead of four runs, and the second to the locals to the tune of 2 to 0.

Charlie Smith was Can'ton's choice to serve them over in the opener, and for a while his selection looked the goods. In the sixth round the erratic slambat took a characteristic ascension, and before he awoke to the occasion four Highlanders had traveled around the circuit. For the next two innings he regained the form shown in the opening sessions.

Manning, one of Stallings' phenoms, whose delivery was a complete puzzle to the Washington sluggers of the day before, twirled for New York. Four meaty bingles was the result of the combined efforts of the team. The base runners rarely got within striking distance of the home plate.

Engle a Star.
Outside of the work of young Manning, the playing of Clyde Engle, the Monopet Eastern League recruit who has proved a sensation all around the circuit, was a feature.

Conroy, the former Highlander, suffered most at the expense of the fleet-footed visitor, who nabbed two drives from his bat, which were stamped for at least three sacks. Otis Clymer, who can spare his hits these days, was also deprived of one in the first game, a Texas Leaguer which the New Yorker snatched on the run.

The second game was decidedly the best of the two from a local standpoint, not only because the victory came the way of the Nationals, but because the natives played like real champions, literally playing their opponents off their feet by lightning fast fielding.

Groom in Form.
"Bob" Groom, Can'ton's Coast recruit, who got off to a bad start but has since developed into one of the mainstays of the pitching staff, was the real hero of the occasion. Not only did he hold his opponents to five scattered hits, several of the scorching variety, but he also fielded his position like a veteran.

He accepted the seven chances that came his way without a slip, and also figured in a play that caused favorable comment among the 5,000 persons who witnessed the game. It came in the second inning, with New York players on the second and third sacks. Street made a motion as if he intended to throw to second to catch Hal Chase, who was well off the bag. Jack Knight, who was on third, stepped off, and to all appearances, was ready to make a dash for the plate. Street quickly threw to Groom, who shot the ball to Conroy, and completed a play that killed the visitors' only chance to score.

The Highlanders continued their good work of the first game in the field, and cut off several bingles from the bats of the Nationals that looked good for hits. Engle, Cree, Hal Chase, and Knight excelled in this respect.

Warhop, who looked good to Stallings to make it two straight, was rather stung by his hits, holding the Nationals to three during the nine sessions. However, he was as wild as a jack rabbit, and to this fact the loss of his game can be partly attributed. He passed four batters and left the impression of one of his shots on the ribs of Mr. Conroy.

Washington had several chances to score in the first game. In the second inning Manning passed Clymer and McBride after two batters had died on infield tags. It was up to Charlie Street, but he was not equal to the occasion, and his best effort was a sod-cut to deep short which was easy for Austin.

Visitors Score.
The four runs scored by the visitors in the first game all came in that disastrous fifth session when Smith suffered the ascension. With a clean single over second, Manning laid one down directly in front of the pan and reached first before Street managed to handle the sphere. Cree duplicated the stunt and reached first while Smith and his partner did the Alphonse and Gaston act. Engle followed with a long drive to deep left which Browne nabbed with one hand. The hit went for a sacrifice, and Kleinow, who was perched at the third corner, romped home with the first run. "Kid" Elberfeld was the next man up, and a well placed hit to left scored Manning. Hemphill was retired, but was up to Charlie Street, but he was not equal to the occasion, and his best effort was a sod-cut to deep short which was easy for Austin.

man for the occasion with a clean single that drove in Browne with the first run. The Nationals' other tally came in the eighth. Milan walked and went to third on Clymer's hit to deep right. McBride flied to center, but the hit was short, and Milan was held on third. Street followed with another one, and this time Milan dashed to the plate and beat the throw in by several feet.

Several chances for the visitors were shut off by fast fielding by the Nationals.
